Notes for Devon Pedigree (Doddiscombsleigh-1481) 32:

For a wide variety of reasons, we may never know exactly to which lineage of Babbs this important family connects. The earliest records of the first 140 years of Doddiscombsleigh were already "irrecoverably" as far back as 1842. Most other records it mentions were lost in a blitz of Exeter in 1942. Through lack of a male heir, the family seems to have given way to the Ducke family and then to Thomas Roach, who sold the Estate in 1769. Because of the vast devastation of the records we have a very limited view of this family and had to reconstruct primarily through secondary accounts such as the Rev. George Oliver's "Ecclesiastical Antiquities in Devon" written in 1842. He points out the lack of early evidence, even at that time. Unfortunately, the copies of wills he mentions were later destroyed prior to having been copied. Oliver's account sheds much light on this family, but lacks in certain ways.

He does however confirm the details of the Babb Arms that was submitted by A William Babb of Doddiscombsleigh in approximately 1620. There are three William's alive at this moment, but it is likely to be the eldest of at the 3 (William 1543-1627) who was also Lord of the Manor from 1602-1627. He failed to get the arms recognized and is deemed by William Camden as an "ignoble omnes". Let's examine that phrase up close:

Ignoble, (ig-noh-buh l): 1. of low character, aims, etc.; mean; base, 2. of low grade or quality; inferior. 3. not noble; of humble descent or rank.

Omnes, 1. all, 2. everybody, 3. everyone

Pulling these together, we see that it was not just a rebuke of the one person, but of the entire family, to describe their claim as illegitimate and their character as low. Given that the family continued to use the arms even after this rebuke may indicate that the description was apt. Oliver described the Crest as "Gules, a bend, Or, between 3 Shovellers heads erased, Or."

This sounds rather short and vague at first, but is the essential info that is needed to reconstruct the arms. Let's look at each word individually.

Gules, (fr. gueules): the heraldic name of the tincture red. The term is probably derived from the Arabic gule, a red rose, just as the azure was derived from a word in the same language, signifying a blue stone. The word was, not doubt, introduced by the Crusaders. Heralds have, however, guessed it to be derived from the Latin gula, which in old French is found as gueule, i.e. the "red throat of an animal." Others, again, have tried to find the origin in the Hebrew word gulade, which signifies red cloth. Gules is denoted in engravings by numerous perpendicular lines.

Bend, (fr. bande): the bend dexter is perhaps one of the most frequently used of Ordinaries, q.v., being a straight piece extending from the dexter corner to the opposite edge of the shield. It is said to derive its origin from the belt, baudrick or baldrick (Baltheus, Cingulum militare), which was once a mark of knighthood; other heralds, however, have seen in it the idea of a scaling-ladder. According to Legh and other heraldic writers, the bend should occupy one-third of the field when charged, and one-fifth when plain. In English arms the bend is always placed straight athwart the shield, and never bowed as in foreign arms: at the same time, in some late MSS. it is fancifully drawn with a curve, in order to represent the convexity of the shield. A bend is very frequently subjected to a modification of its margin, and is engrailed, invected, indented, embattled, counter-embattled, bretessed, raguly, champaine (or warriated), nebuly, wavy; also bevilled, cotticed and fimbriated, all of which terms will be found explained.

Or, (fr. from Latin aurum): the chief of the tinctures, i.e. gold. Engravers represent it by an indefinite number of small points. The term Gold is frequently used by heralds to avoid repetition, and the French word Jaune, i.e. yellow, is met with in old heraldic poetry.

Shoveller. The Male Shoveler (formerly Shoveller) is characterized by a dark green head, yellow eyes and a bill that appears longer than the head itself, thus resembling a shovel. As this is a very patriarchal society, the ducks pictured were most likely Males. See Ducks.

Ducks, (fr. canard): We find this very large family (anatinœ) represented in heraldry under several names. The duck proper, as also the drake. The shield-drake, or sheldrake, as it is written (anas tadorna). The wild-duck (anas boschas), with the teal (anas crecea) and the mallard. What is meant by the sea-teal is not certain. The sholarde, or shoveller (anas clypeata) may be distinguished by two small tufts of feathers, one on the back of the head, another on the breast.

Erased, eraced, or erazed(fr. arraché): violently torn off, leaving a jagged edge. Then term is chiefly applied to the heads and limbs of animals. When applied to birds' legs the expression à-la-quise, i.e. à la cuisse, is often added to signify that the upper part of the leg is shewn. A head erased close signifies that it is torn off without any part of the neck remaining attached to it.

Pulling this all back together we have a Red ridged background with a Gold diagonal stripe running approximately 1/5th of the size of the entire shield from the top right shoulder of the bearer to the bottom left hip (this is always described from the point of the view of the person holding it, not from the perspective of the person viewing it). The Gold is dotted throughout. Three Male Shoveler Duck heads without a neck and a tattered end adorn the Red ridged background on either side of the gold stripe. The heads are Dark Green and two small tufts of feathers, one on the back of the head, another on the breast. This is offset by the gold eye on each of the duck heads.

The only remaining question is which side had two ducks and which side had 1. The text does not tell us, but we will continue to look for examples and adjust as more information becomes available.

The family is known to us as Devon Pedigree 32 and is not currently connected to a particular Y-DNA proven lineage. Given the lack of male heirs, we are unable to tell at this time to which lineage they properly belong. There was at least one example of the crest that survived into modern times in the form of a bowl, but the exact location of the bowl is not currently known. It is believed to be in the US. A picture of the bowl exists but has not yet been located as of this writing.

If you have information regarding these arms, please contact the Babb Family Association or myself.

- 7 Doddiscombsleigh Manor Records, Website of the Town Barton Historic Manor House (exact URL unknown). History
Also known as the Capital Messuage or Mansion House of Doddiscombsleigh.
Earliest records name a Saxon called Alsi as being the landowner of Doddiscombsleigh prior to 1066, he was later dispossessed as were virtually all the Saxon landowners.
The first record of Town Barton is in the Domesday Book of 1086 when Doddiscombsleigh was known as Terra Godeboldi under the reign of one Godbold the Bowman. Town Barton was the Capital Barton (Manor House) for Godbold's Domesday Estates. This makes it one of the very rare instances of a property truly being specifically traceable to where a Domesday owner dwelt.
The manor of Doddiscombsleigh was also known as Legh- Peverel in church records of the 14th century. the latter name was dropped when it changed hands from the Legh to the Doddescomb family. A Sir Ralph Doddescomb was living in the old mansion house in the reign of Henry 111 (1216-1272). Today, the old mansion is Town Barton lying adjacent to the church.
The Babb family purchased the manor and Mansion H.
